Abstract: In recent years, fiscal decentralization has been advocated world wide. While fiscal decentralization has many reasons for being adopted around the world, the common motive is that fiscal decentralization is considered to have the potential to improve the performance of the public sector. However, recent studies argue that the conventional wisdom may remain true in developed countries, but it is not the case in developing countries. The hold that the conventional argument that decentralized provision of public goods will increase efficiency in resource allocation may not be applicable in developing countries. This study wants to prove that argument by pool data in Indonesia (2002-2005).*
